

Name your enemy, Part II

By Jud Jones, KSGOP 1st Congressional District

After I finished the “Name your enemy” piece, I continued to think about what a “right” truly is. What does, “I have the right to free speech” or “We can all peacefully demonstrate for this reason or that, because we have the right to assemble” or “I can carry a hand gun because of the Second Amendment” mean? The American Heritage Dictionary defines “right” (look it up to obtain a precise meanings), I believe that “rights” come from the creator, are inalienable, based on moral, ethical tradition, and are critical for free thinking, living, and societal intercourse. Without having the right to free speech, those in charge of our lives could silence us with the threat of destruction. Without the right to arm ourselves, we risk constant lose of our lives to those bent on controlling us. Without the right of trial by jury, we could be imprisoned for any reason those in charge choose, (etc). Basically, without our Constitutional rights, we would live in tyranny.

Why is this important? The socialist/progressive party and those currently in power have gone on record many times in the past with ideas, dogma, and actual plans to abridge the right to have and carry arms; to limit forms of speech that are critical of their perspective of how we should live, to place the value of one race above another by using race as a means of dividing and demeaning others; to vilify the police of this nation as bigots, racists, and thugs so as to justify insurrection in the streets of some of our greatest cities; to create a complete fabrication about the state of the Earth’s climate so as to enrich segments of their power circle at the expense of others; and to justify their total disdain for a duly elected president by carrying out a campaign of lies, fabrication, and conspiracy to attempt to remove him from office. A quick review of Saul Alinski’s Rules for Radicals clearly identifies what they are doing. A rereading of Marx’s and Engels’ Communist Manifesto also identifies many of the socialist/progressive methods of indoctrination of the people by using underhanded tactics and propaganda to attempt to sway opinion.

Earlier, I addressed “rights” by stating that without them we face a world of intolerable tyranny. Rights are not meant to allow parts of our society to misbehave, to act out with violence, to conduct themselves in such a way as to erode good order and discipline, or to condescend to those in society that do not agree with them. In the first piece I asked you to consider what is missing in the communist mind. I think it must be something to do with a lack of moral rectitude. Somewhere in their past they missed the “lecture” about how to behave in a peaceful, polite world. Communists are forever busy and always unhappy unless their elites are running things. For any of you reading this and saying how wrong I am, review what I have said by reading the three cited references, then tell me were I have failed to see the issue. In closing I would relate an old expression attributed to President John Adams, “If you are twenty and not liberal, I would fear you have no heart; if you are forty and not conservative, I would fear you have no brain.”
